In case you're thinking of using a Hanfu device instead of a Blackberry, you should know that the data is encrypted at the network level. The Korean provider SK Telecom provides an E2ME-based end-to-end encryption solution for its mobile services and customers of its private Internet access service. The company will enable some of its customers to use the BolehOn service using E2ME as well. In addition, BolehOn Korea will enable data transfer on Google's Project Fi platform, instead of its own network, so that customers can make calls and send texts using BolehOn. Although the service is currently only available in South Korea, BolehOn Korea is not planning to make the service available in other regions. The news was revealed by its CEO Park Tae-seong on the company's corporate website on Sunday. The CEO said that he will use the proceeds to improve and launch new services. A federal judge has declined to dismiss a lawsuit by a California couple who claimed Christian preschools discriminated against them because they were Christians. The suit was brought against Christian Community Schools in July 2011 by Charles and Pamela Young. The couple's 9-year-old daughter, Grace, was denied enrollment in the school when they sent her a note indicating that she was a Christian, the Southern Poverty Law Center said. After that the family's rights were violated, they were harassed, the lawsuit alleges, and were the subject of a threatening letter and e-mail. After the family sued, the school's insurance company withdrew the defense because it didn't feel it would be "acting in good faith" to defend the school. "Our legal team has diligently defended against the claims in this lawsuit for 82157476af
